bles caused many German Protestants to seek new homes in America; the country itself did not and was not able to attempt an extension of its empire. Adhough the people who dwelt between the Alps and northern seas, between Frace and the Slavs, founded no colonies in America, they have given to the rising country many of its most prominent citizens.

Gustavus Adolphus only three weeks before he fell at Lutzen recommended to Germans colonization in America "as a blessing to the Protestant world." In pursuance of the design of the Swedish king, the Chancellor Oxensteirn, in 1632 called on the German people to send emigrants to America, and later in the year, the upper four German circles confirmed the charter, and under its sanction a Protestant colony was planted firmly on the Delaware, a monument to Gustavus which is not equaled by any left to his enemy Wallenstein.

Thronged to America.

Driven by poverty and sorrow and the reckless devastation of foreign invasion in the terrible thirty years' war, and the oppression of domestic, petty tyrants, the Germans, especially within the borders of the Rhime, thronged to America in such numbers that in the course of a century, preserving their love of a rural life, they had obtained much of the best land from Mohawk to the valley of Virginia.

When William Penn had acquired his province, he advertised it so advantageously that he attracted immigrants from Germany, many of them the soberest and most thrifty of the race. Since those early days of immigration the number of German immigrants to this country has reached the five million mark, and in 1903 the number of German immigrants amounted to 43,085, a greater number than for any year since 1894. sion in the terrible thirty years' war,
